Robin Narruhn is a community activist who works towards health equity using an antiracist, emancipatory lens. She is a nurse researcher and professor at Seattle University. She earned her Ph.D. in Nursing Science from the University of Washington. Her master's degree is in community and global health. Her research focus is on mitigating health inequities in immigrant communities. A nurse at the age of twenty, she has worked in high-risk maternal child nursing and community health. Robin Narruhn has volunteered for the Pacific Island Health Board of Washington State, the Washington State BIPOC Ecosystem and the COVID Pandemic Antiracism Community Advisory Group (PARCAG) of Public Health Seattle King County. She is one of 2 founding co-chairs of the Community Health Board Coalition (CHBC), which began with 9 ethnic health boards in 2017, currently, with 16 health boards. The coalition's work is focused on policy that promotes health equity. The CHBC work includes community-based two participatory research projects, one was a community mental health assessment, and the other was an assessment of community health priorities. In her spare time, she spends time with her daughter, is learning to garden, and visits the hummingbirds in her backyard.
