

audited and does not require random selection of the ballots to be audited;

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT MOVED by the Council of King County:

The King County council hereby establishes the council's intent to include as part of its 2008 state legislative agenda, a request to revise of Washington State law to permit individual counties to adopt by ordinance customized procedures for conducting routine, random, postelection audits of election results, as long as those procedures are at least as statistically valid in assuring the accuracy of election results as the procedures prescribed by state law for other counties.